Answer to the question no :1

The painting is a self-portrait of Mary Hoover Aiken, who is shown reading her own fortune in a cafe on the Spanish island of Ibiza. Beginning with the artist's image and working your way outward from there, describe what you see in the images.

Mary Hoover Aiken is the name of this girl, who cannot possibly be older than sixteen. Despite her age and appearance, she is an exceptionally talented painter and fortune teller. With a baby face that is smooth and creamy brown, she hides her enormous potential and shows her Italian heritage. Her features were carefully framed by her shining dark black hair, which was neatly pinned back. She matches this neat look by sitting in a plain formal dress that is baggy and has a collar that is out of style for her time and looks like it came from a long time ago. She appeared to have just returned from church or even school in her formal attire. She flips silently on a plain wooden table, her eyes lowered to her numbered black and red cards.

a group of men seated in rounded seats around the young Italian girl and drinking beer. I will never know why Mary Hoover was alone in a bar. We can only speculate as to whether she is actually telling fortunes or simply waiting.

The craftsman incorporates an extremely definite setting of herself, all that in the picture highlighting something, similar to the loose plain dress, sun cap, which proposes she hasn't been here lengthy and arrived at this spot from a more proper setting. The men, with their paired tables and beers, informed me that this is a bar. Every little thing is given importance, and even the way she flips the card she is holding is designed to catch the eye.

The painting's main focus is Mary Hoover Aiken, followed by everything else in descending order of importance further away.

Caravaggio was attempting to portray social class and a secret attraction between people of different social classes as a dominant impression. The maid girl and the potential duke or wealthy man exchange unspoken words. They are making eye contact while silently exchanging words, and she is gently reading his fortune by touching his hand. The scandalous topic of the forbidden attraction between people of different social statuses. This is completely in contradiction to Aiken's Cafe Fortune Teller; The most fundamental difference is that Aiken is by herself, lost in her cards and in herself. She has a substantial fortune, is not sexual, and has no other agenda.
